Are Public Schools Harming Your Kids? | Samuel L. Blumenfeld

Published on Mar 19, 2012

Samuel L. Blumenfeld documents the unprecedented decline in academic quality of education that has precipitated an exodus of children from government schools. Blumenfeld examines public education from the early 1830's to 1986. Filmed in 1986 and produced by The John Birch Society's American Opinion Blumenfeld is an author and expert in the use of phonics for reading instruction.

The following is part of a letter that I sent to a candidate for governor here in Oregon. It briefly explains why I have offered homeschooling to families. (November 2014)

“I have spent many hundreds of hours in research related to the history and present conditions in our nation's schools. One of the perceptions I now have is that even when Common Core and its testing is repealed, the states are still stuck with needing to be controlled by the federal and state governments. States will need to develop their own standards and standardized testing, both of which ends up in removing local control for our school districts, teachers, and parents. We have seen the declining results for over 70 years.

“ Freedom for educating children is best obtained in offering home schooling to our children. During my years of teaching many hundreds in the private sector, a "system" of personalized education evolved to the point of offering a guarantee of progress that was unlike any program in the country. My hope as I worked to overcome Common Core, was to offer the principles to public schools. I see now that it would be a miracle to have schools accept the kind of education I had offered, hence I am beginning to develop another website. It will offer inexpensive, proven effective guidelines and materials that has attained a minimum of 2 school year levels for every child that was part of my learning centers.”
